THE TROUBLE AT MONTAUK.

W. E. Curtis in Chicago Record, I find intense jealousy between the different branches of the service. The medical men hate the commissaries, and both hate the quartermasters, who reciprocate with fervor, and they are all trying to put each other "in the hole." The system is worse than the men. The red tape that is required in every transaction no matter how insignificant, entangles the whole camp. For example, when a surgeon calls for food the commissary should supply it and the quartermaster provide for its transportation. Between the three are innumerable requisitions, indorsements, permits, Col. George Harvey Will Man authorizations and all that sort of thing, which take time and patience. For example, when a lot of soldiers left a transport the other day they were so weak they could not walk, surgeon made a requisition for more. That requisition had to go through the total cost of the war to Spain is the usual circumlocution, and it took soldiers might have died had it not been for the Red Cross people, who furnished all that was necessary in
